DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The structure consisted originally of a basement for storage, a studio above it twenty-two by thirty feet with a sixteen-foot ceiling. There was a balustered sun deck for the roof, and there were three entrances. On the south a small portico served as a carriage porch, while on the west the entrance was to a small reception room opening off the studio. The third entrance was also the typical large north window, almost the size of the wall. A trapdoor led to the basement, and the north window was hinged so as to permit its opening for loading and unloading of materials, including large or heavy crates and blocks of stone or heavy pieces of sculpture. The north elevation was so designed as to place the massively reinforced studio floor and north window-entrance at a convenient level for delivery vehicles. The adjoining reception room is two steps higher to facilitate keeping its floor free of dust and particles from the studio.

A small square mezzanine-type balcony is situated in the southeast corner of the studio, reached by narrow ladder-like steps. By curtaining it the artist had a rest and dressing area which by a second flight of ladder-like steps gave access to the roof and its sun deck.

Being windowed on the north and east sides, it is a pleasant and comfortable work area, presently used as crafts studios. The size of the basement was more than doubled by the enlargement of the building in 1902.

The additions on the east half of the building in 1902 consist of a tower, another porch, and two large rooms. The tower forms the centralizing element of the south front of the building. It contains an entrance hall and a stairwell leading to the second story east room and to a tower room at the third level. A ground-level door into the tower makes it possible to reach the upper stories of the building without entering either the studio or the large exhibit room added onto its east side. The latter is entered by a more monumental doorway enframed by a small square porch formed by the east wall of the tower and the south wall of the exhibit room. A stone pier at the southeast corner and a pilaster against the tower support the roof of the porch which constitutes a balcony entered from the second story east room. The railing of the balcony is composed of stone plinths connected by metalwork enframing the Texas "Lone Star" motif.

The second floor comprises mainly a single large room which served as a retreat and rest area for the artist. Her husband, Dr. Edmund Montgomery, used the tower room for his study when visiting from Liendo Plantation. (Living quarters were in a temporary structure separate from the studio building.) The harmony of the building with its site is often remarked upon, and this guality perhaps partly explains why the composition as a whole, visible mainly from the south and from the west, seems harmonious in spite of disparate elements. The classical quality of the original studio portion consists mainly in the portico which is subordinate to the structure as a whole, and its classical elements are personal or modified: triglyphs formed into brackets, columns octagonal rather than actually fluted, and the pediment well below the roofline behind it. The small wing on the west which served as a reception room has а suggestion of crennelation at the top, and this seems subtly to harmonize that end of the building with the slight crennelation treatment of the top of the tower. Even the second small porch on the east side of the tower, though dissimilar to the classical one, does not clash with it, perhaps because of the suggestion of classical forms in its parapet. The simplicity of all these forms keeps any of them from being obtrusive or clashing, and the use of limestone in the entire structure helps to blend the parts, while the restrained boldness of the tower gives a focus to the composition. The building clearly expresses that the whole design was worked out, and its parts related one to the other by a sculptor.

The sculpturess Elisabet Ney (b. Munster, Germany, 1833, d. Austin, Texas, 1907) designed the building as a sculptor's studio and supervised its construction in 1892, at which time she was beginning to receive substantial commissions in Austin.

Although the artist more than doubled the building's size by adding a half story and tower in 1902, the studio portion remains intact and could, even today, serve its original purpose (The entire building remains essentially as it was in the artist's lifetime and the same is true of its setting.)

Having become a United States citizen in 1884, Elisabet Ney's status as an outstanding European artist (court sculptor to Ludwig II of Bavaria and also recipient of numerous Prussian and Hanoverian state commissions) gradually became known in Texas where she and her husband, Dr. Edmund Montgomery, had purchased the plantation, "Liendo", a National Register property, near Hempstead, in 1873. Virtually all her productive life as an American artist transpired at the Austin studio which she called "Formosa" after a villa she once occupied in Maderage. 20

The Building of the Austin studio was part of an undertaking by which she eventually attracted notice at the national level. Her career in Austin began with her commission by the Committee for the Texas Pavillion in 1892 to execute statues of Stephen F. Austin and of Sam Houston for the 1893 Columbian Exhibition in Chicago. Those two works were the first from the Austin studio, and in 1905 they were permanently placed in Statuary Hall of the National Capitol A duplicate pair cut under the artist's supervision were placed in the state capitol. A substantial body of works was produced in the meantime, all from the Austin studio where the artist worked until her death. Her first Texas commission had been an American counterpart of her two earlier works shown in the Prussian exhibit at the Paris International Exhibition of 1867, busts of Bismark and Garibaldi. A chronology of the artist's works, European and American reveals that the latter half were created at "Formosa". Most notable of all, a "Lady Macbeth" on permanent exhibit at the Smithsonian collection, has received substantial scholarly and critical commendation.

The studio is well-known and has long been associated with the artist. The building was mentioned in Lorado Taft's History of American Sculpture in 1903, and it served as a nucleus in 1911 for gatherings and organizational activities leading to the founding of the Texas Fine Arts Association. In its charter that group defined as one of its objectives "the preservation of the memory and the art collection of Elisabet Ney." The building has been a museum since 1909 and belongs to the city of Austin whereas the collection, though permanently housed at the studio, actually is the property of the University of Texas. Elisabet Nev's often-expressed desire and sense of mission to foster the fine arts in Texas, where the state university had no art department in her lifetime, has, to a significant extent, been carried foreward in the building which was her studio. She left no will, but her widower and friends made possible the preservation and eventually the public custodianship of the grounds, the building, and the collection of her works.

It is evident that the studio represents standard European norms and practices in its makeup and facilities. Its design by the artist no doubt reflects her formative experience of the European half of her career. That she was able to bring about the construction of such a facility without an architect's assistance in a place where there had been no precedent for it was indeed a pioneering accomplishment. Its lasting effects are evidenced by the respect in which the establishment has always been held and by the survival and success of the Texas Fine Arts Association which traces its origins to the example and influence of Elisabet Ney. Legends grew up about her long before her death, and their survival as local folklore add to the significance of the building.

Mr. Jerry Rogers Chief Registration Branch The National Register Department of the Interior Washington, D.C. 20240

Dear Jerry:

May Diana Harris, the Curator of the Elisabet Ney Studio, "Formosa", called yesterday to inform me that the City of Austin has applied for a HUD historic preservation grant-in-aid for this outstanding structure. We were unaware of this when the submission was made. Therefore, would it be possible to so annotate the submission so that the review by your office can be expedited?

Thank you for your cooperation.

With warmest regards,

Gary L. Hume Director, National Register Programs for Texas
