Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Prominently sited on a hill overlooking Bear Creek, Brambletye is a rare example of a late 19th century English vernacular residence in the Texas Hill Country. A wealthy English immigrant, William Hall, built the two-and-three-story limestone house between 1895 and 1900. Despite ownership by many different individuals, the house has changed little since its completion and retains its historic character and integrity. The castle-like structure blends very well with the surrounding rugged and hilly countryside.

Built of random coursed ashlar limestone quarried nearby, Brambletye exhibits a rectangular plan with a three-story mid-section and two-story gable roof wings projecting to the east and west. A one-story shed roof porch with ten massive, chamfered, hand-hewn columns highlights the front (south) facade. The porch also displays an uncommon, regular coursed stone floor. The front's ground level is pierced with five openings which include a centrally located main entrance capped by a broad, semicircular arch. This archway has been partially enclosed, and the original doors have been replaced with double, French doors. The remaining first floor openings exhibit fixed, single light transoms with segmental arches. Six 4/4 wood sash windows with smooth stone sills and lintels pierce the second story. Because of its darker toned limestone construction, the third floor appears to stand out from the remainder of the house. Stone, exterior end chimneys rise from the east and west side of the third floor's high pitch, pyramidal roof.

Displaying imbricated shingled gable ends, the east and west exterior walls are highlighted with segmental arch ground level openings similar to those of the front. A small bay windows with paired 1/1 wood sash windows extends from the east gable end. Three scroll brackets support this bay window.

The fenestration and detailing of the south (rear) elevation are identical to the front, but a one-story recent addition obscures the ground floor's original exterior. The second and third floors, however, remain intact.

The interior features a two leveled central hall plan with single, equal sized rooms on either side. The original kitchen, to the west of the ground level hall, has a stone floor and an unadorned by slightly projecting fireplace which pierces the common wall between the kitchen and central hallway. The parlor, the easternmost room, has similar styled fireplace, but exhibits a hardwood floor. Massive hand-hewn walnut beams support the ceilings of both rooms. The absence of any stucco and the flushed window trim against the two foot thick limestone walls suggest that these rooms as well as all other walls have retained their original exposed stone walls. Pierced with semicircular arches in the north and south walls, the central hallway remains open up to the second floor. A stairway with slender wood balustrades provides access to the second level, and a balcony railing framing the large opening in the floor allows a view down to the first floor. Bedrooms flank either side of this hallway. Beaded wood partitioning divides the west room into separate bedrooms. A steep staircase leads up to the third floor bedroom.

No outbuildings contemporary to Brambletye remain standing today. The only permanent structure in the immediate vicinity of the house is a gambrel roof, stone structure erected in 1975 just west of the main house. This building serves as a temporary residence while Brambletye undergoes its restoration. Presumably, the structure will be used as a guest house. A mobile home is located behind Brambletye and will be moved when restoration work is completed.

The current owners' plans include the restoration and renovation of Brambletye. Fortunately, the structure has only been slightly modified, but the majority of the work will involve repairing structural damage and deterioration. The only exterior alteration, the rear one-story addition, will be removed, and a porch will be rebuilt utilizing chamfered columns from the original porch.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Brambletye represents an extremely rare example of a late 19th century English vernacular residence in the Texas Hill Country region and remains one of Kimble county's most significant architectural landmarks. Built between 1895 and 1900, this two-and-three-story limestone structure was erected by William Hall, a wealthy Englishman who had come to Texas in 1888. After Hall's death in 1900, Brambletye and its accompanying ranch land remained intact despite ownership by a number of prosperous individuals who include Weaver Baker, a former chairman of the State Board of Control and law partner of the late Coke Stevenson, Governor of Texas from 1941 to 1947.

Kimble County and, in particular, the Junction area, possesses one of the few enclaves of English immigrants to the Texas Hill Country region. The majority of 19th century settlers to the Texas Hill Country immigrated from Germany and erected structures which reflected their heritage. Such communities as Fredericksburg, New Braunfels, and Mason are well known because of their numerous examples of fachwerk and other German style structures. Unfortunately, few structures stand today which reflect the English tradition. Brambletye is one of the best and least altered examples of this rare architectural style in the Texas Hill Country and represents an important chapter in the region's architectural development and evolution.

Brambletye has long been the subject of rumors and ghost stories, and the task of distinguishing fact from fiction has been a difficult chore. Little is known about Brambletye's builder and original owner, William Hall. However, one of his daughters, Mary Hall Paterson, wrote a brief family history in 1947. Entitled "I Remember," her memoirs remain the most reliable source of information concerning the Hall family.

Mary's description of her father depicts a colorful yet rebellious man. Born in Southwick, Sussex County, England in 1833, William Hall ran away from his home in Brighton when only thirteen and apprenticed himself for the next seven years to an architect, J.U. Rastrick. Soon after completing his apprenticeship, Hall set out for Canada in search of new adventures and married Elizabeth Barton in 1858. They soon returned to England, and Hall established an architectural office near London. His career as an architect was shortlived, however, as his father's death in 1863 forced him to return to Sussex to oversee family business operations and landholdings. His daughter's only reference to a building designed by him is a Gothic Revival church near Tunbridge Wells. Hall's business endeavors prospered, especially his dredging company, and he also became involved in politics. He ran as a Liberal candidate for the House of Commons in 1880 against Lord Randolph Churchill but was narrowly defeated.

In 1888, Hall decided to see his son, Fred, who had come to Kimble County, Texas three years earlier. In 1892, family business affairs required Hall to once again travel to England, but he soon returned to Texas and decided to build a stone house overlooking Bear Creek north of Junction. He named the structure Brambletye from a novel by Horace Smith. And, according to his daughter, Hall used the structure as a convalescent home for old men. While building a gateway with pillars resembling the tower at the San Jose Mission in San Antonio, he contracted "blood poisoning" from one of his "patients." He traveled to San Antonio for treatment but died on March 30, 1900.

Hall's will deeded Brambletye to his son, Fred. The property legally remained in the Hall family until Lela Hall Nance died in 1928 and her husband, O.D., acquired complete ownership of the property. In 1937 Weaver Baker purchased Brambletye and the ranchland. Baker, a former county judge of Kimble County, was a law partner of Coke Stevenson, Governor of Texas from 1941 to 1947, and was appointed chairman of the State Board of Control during Stevenson's administration. Baker died in an auto accident in 1946. His family maintained the property until the present owners purchased the house and ranch in 1981.
